Judge Brown, of the United States District Court, in New York city, has retelered a very important decision concerning cases in bankruptey. He says:

"Involuntary assignments of all a debtor's property in trust for the creditors are incompatible with the bankrupt act, and to allowed to stand against a signment of all of his property by an assigned debtor to an assignee of his own choosing is of itself an act of bank-ruptey, and is 'fraudulent', not in common law, but because it defeats the rights of creditors to the choice of a trustee. In the eye of the law the voluntary assignee is an accomplice in a fraud, and therefore can hold nothing by the assignment as against the trustee in bank-read as against the trustee in bankment as against the trustee in bank-ruptcy. I must hold that a voluntary as-signment for the benefit of creditors, which, by the statute, is made 'an act of bankruptcy,' is voldable by the trustee, and the assets should be brought into the hardwanter court.'

MULE CARS AND VESTIBULES.

A Problem Which Now Confronts the Old Electric Company. The law enacted by the last Legislature equiring all street car companies to equip their cars with vestibules, is in effect this morning, and both the comhere are reasonably prepared to meet it.

The traction Company has been ready for some time, having put neat vestibules of wood and glass on both ends of its cars, but the cars of the Richmond Railway and Electric Company had not been fully equipped last night. Some of them were finished, but others had only been vestibuled at one end, and no glass had been put in that end.

One problem, which seems difficult of solution, confronts the company. It is: How can vestibules be put on the mule cars?

And if they are put on the mule cars.

And if they are put on the mule cars how is the driver going to reach the mules and persuade them to make schedule time? Echo answers: How?

At any rate the company had not undertaken to solve that problem last night, and the bob-tall line was doing business at the old stand, the driver perched up in the little space in front, scarcely large enough to comfortably men of this and all lands inevitably exert. carcely large enough to comfortably contain his feet, while he showered blows

The address of the evening was delivered by Bishop Gibson and was a practical, eloquent and beautiful exposition of the "basic" principles, as he styled them, of the brotherhood, which are prayer and service. and service.

"Men of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew," said he, "it is an inspiring sight to look upon your gathered bands in this church to-night." He should speak to them as a brotherhood man, a member of the organization for years and a Bishop of the Church. "No clergyman," said he, "and certainly no Bishop can fall to reckon with the brotherhood."

He then proceeded to show the influ-
